

GUITAR CONCERTO THREE SONGS

ANDREW BLYTH

OWEN THOMSON | GUITAR

move

ANDREW BLYTH

GUITAR CONCERTO 1999

- 1 Allegro 8'19"
- 2 Andante 10'20"
- 3 Allegro Vivo 7'50"

THREE SONGS

- 4 A heart 3'47"
- 5 Autumn walk 3'16"
- 6 Trudyanne's song 3'32"

© 2005 Andrew Blyth

© 2004 Move Records

move.com.au

GUITAR CONCERTO 1999 THREE SONGS

ANDREW BLYTH | VIRTUAL ORCHESTRA
OWEN THOMSON | GUITAR

The music on this CD looks forward to the twenty-first century and the possibility of a new aesthetic for classical music. At the end of the twentieth century, classical music suffered from an apparent paradox: new additions to the repertoire were desperately needed but composers seemed unable to write music that could appeal to listeners and performers. As a result, classical music ceased to have cultural significance and now appears to us as the relic of a distant past. Only composers can remedy this situation. By writing music that aims to engender and appeal to audiences, I am hoping to revive the role of the composer-as-entertainer.

The music presented here intentionally crosses the boundaries between classical music and popular music. It looks to recognisable forms as a model for new music. The three songs arranged for orchestra with guitar soloist are modelled on popular song forms. They are abstract pieces that are simply meant to be good tunes but they also recognize that all music begins with the song and with melody. In this respect, these songs aim to encapsulate the most essential elements of good music.

The musical language which I have used in the songs is developed in a more extended way in the concerto. The traditional concerto form is used to organize musical ideas which balance melodic and rhythmic interest within an essentially familiar harmonic framework. The music is again abstract but aims to appeal to the average classical music radio listener. As with the songs, the goal of the music is melodic memorability, rhythmic vitality and entertainment.

Andrew Blyth

Andrew Blyth is a Melbourne teacher and composer. This CD is dedicated to his wife, Trudyanne. Owen Thomson is a Melbourne guitarist who has previously released the CD Rafaga on Move Records. Cover design: Benjamin Thomas

